Tickle the palate series

oil painting / 100x150 cm

2013

What is certain or ephemeral loses its meaning in relation to what we see; certainty has a structure of ephemerality and vice versa. This statement can be applied to almost all works of Dorota Buczkowska. In her projects, she combines many different techniques and unexpected materials; objects of her artistic work seem to lose their formal borders. An idea which stands beyond her artistic work is process, a kind of change which involves both creation and destruction. Depending on used material, the emphasis is put on a different element of changing reality such as physical processes like temperature, pressure or passing time. It could be movement, or destruction of the work caused by itself or by the audience. Works are usually bodily centered in the sense of their sensuality, tactile qualities and relation to their surrounding. This we can find in the Interror (2009) a type of floor installation made with paraffin, which is a material sensitive to touch and heat. In the Swing (2008-2011), two balloons filled with helium react atmospheric phenomena. Cosmetics with their natural thickness and texture, when applied on paper create half-transparent drawings sensitive to a play of light and color. Circulation, change and process is in all of Buczkowska's works.

Dorota Buczkowska's drawings focus on combining physiology with psyche and on connecting the flows of emotions with the flows of bodily fluids; they explore various spaces of corporeality, sensuality, feelings and mind. Organised in a kind of a tableau, i.e. a nearly academic collection or a collection typical of natural sciences, they imperceptibly turn from abstract forms into the organic, figurative and fantastic ones. They preserve their complete autonomy and interconnectedness, ensuing from a great concentration and centrifugal energy, dragging the viewer deeper and deeper towards the invisible centre. Their materiality – density and saturation in combination with their transparency – result from the materials applied, i.e. colourful makeup products. Posing no barrier to the light, they resemble X-rays of rather undefined emotional organs, concentrations, combinations, fractures. The materiality of the dense tissue in the drawings is combined with the corporeality of the both forms and artistic gesture itself, with the inclusion of the direct relation of touch, i.e. the moments of connection between the colour applied and the living, warm skin.

Interror

Czarna Gallery

2008

'Interror' is a neologism not to be found in Polish or any other language. As a combination of two words; 'interior' and 'terror' it does, however, ring a familiar bell. Dorota Buczkowska penetrates the space between the tangible and the imaginary. Interror, although feeds on politics of today, does not do so overtly. It emerges on the verge of the internal, private world and the outside. Each work of the series contains at least two layers of contradictory meaning which results in the unspecified discomfort in the viewer. The artist does not try to deny that the materials she uses may well be misused for evil purposes. Grapes reminiscent of insects' nests that hang on the wall actually consist of little balls filled with explosives. Malformations on another wall are signs of a disease which struck a lifeless substance. Another work is small chocolate-like bars in little plastic sacks with a recipe for a home-made bomb found on the Internet attached to each of them.

The exhibition at Czarna Gallery has been inspired by the elegant bourgeois staircase of the downtown Warsaw tenement building where it is situated. The white, glossy, marble-like material which covers the whole floor brings to mind the original elegant character. Unlike marble, however, the floor cracks underfoot, while strangely familiar scent hangs in the air. The floor is made of paraffin and in it intertwined are streaks of ground sulphure, saltpeter and coal. Thus, every visitor treading on the ingredients of gun powder, with each step participates in the symbolic re-enactment of the destruction of the world which created the very building but which no longer exists in reality. The demons of the past which so often haunt Polish souls add meaning to the universal tale of crises, uncertainty and loss of ground. The main theme of Dorota Buczkowska's work is, as it seems, a journey to the roots of our fear during which she tries to touch upon the frailty of life and – eventually – of death.

Alibi

exploration project

2011

The Alibi project fully belongs to rational diffusion. What we see is not happening here, but somewhere else. In a still frame, a stone suddenly moves with the current of the stream. Foam polystyrene snow falls in the mountains and then a mist fills the screen with over expanding white. You have to be really attentive in this absent structure to find a place for the one who observes. Representation in Dorota Buczkowska's films does not present the image of reality, nor does it exists as its supplement, rather it emerges in the image creating another layer - in the end something, which is impossible to distinguish from what is regarded as natural. Suspending the mythical order of representation and beginning: we can observe one layer after another put together with the silent presence of the camera. Was there anyone behind it? Or where they somewhere else?

The first impression of the photographs – quiet mountain landscape – is like we were watching a calendar or a postcard from holidays. Paper placed consequently in each frame, doesn't really disturb, it is more invisible in the entire structure of the composition. But it is just a first impulse of perception – a curtain. After a while we feel deconcentrated by unnaturally high resolution. The human eye does not perceive in this way; eye is less precise, it doesn't pay attention to details, and it focuses usually on a one thing and leaves the rest blurred. (...) Apnea is a moment of tension, stillness, hold on. This project can be seen as a moment of pause in front of the curtain or rupture. A pause, which after a while will become one or the other. There is still an asked question: isn't there any other possibility?

Buczkowska is digging deep and marking layers of her own body and the memory frozen within. She observes the process of their constant circulation, hardening and softening. The form is flowing restlessly and searching for a place for itself. The medium has no meaning. (...) In her work, states of concentration transcend undetected from one to another, it is noticeable that something is getting closer, the old and used up is gone and the new didn't yet show up on the horizon.

The work of Dorota Buczkowska and Joao Vilhen is an attempt of catching the language of infatuation, freezing it, observing something which is impossible to see. A drawing that is stretched out across the wall is a documentation of two hearts beating being unified into one line - the statistic average of infatuation. The body understood through physiology, physiognomy or anatomy is an element of the knowledge of drawing or sculpture coming down to an practical skill set.
